

The author presents the lithostratigraphy and biostratigraphy of lands formed during the Pliocene and the Quaternary over the past five million years and provides information on the palaeoclimate and the source-areas of sediments, the geological structure and the neotectonic movements.

The palaeogeographical evolution and some characteristics of the present-day geological environment are also analysed.

